How dogs spread happiness

The result? Better health for you!

Written by
Steve Dale

For years it's been thought sharing your life with a dog is healthful. Now scientists are beginning to understand why.

Science is only beginning to understand the intrinsic relationship we have with dogs. "I always want dogs in my life," says Katherine Heigl — and it appears that will pay off for her in multiple ways. The mere act of petting a dog can cause a chain of events. Instantly, neurotransmitters in our heads do a happy dance — it's involuntary. We feel good.

When we feel good, we are more likely to smile. Whenever we smile, still more neurotransmitters...

Protect your pet from Alzheimer's

Written by
Steve Dale

Exercise is essential for your brain -- and your dog's.

If everyone in America had a dog and walked it daily, our brains would benefit — and so would our dogs'. Carl Cottman, director of Alzheimer's Disease Research at the University of California-Irvine, says regular moderate exercise turns out to be healthy for our heads as well as our hearts. And the same goes for our dogs.

As Alzheimer's disease occurs in people, so does a similar syndrome in our pets...
